

Common Purpose Exercise

A false summit is when it looks like you're at the top, but you're not. What are some false summits you've experienced with projects and initiatives at work?

What will you do when you notice a team member who is working themselves to death? (Often, you'll see these people rewarded for their "loyalty.")

What will you do when you are working yourself too hard? (Remember—the body keeps the score.)

What are some ways you can practice leading others where you have no formal authority (for example, peers and superiors)?

How can people get motivated from their team during difficult times?
